Getting started in published on assessment in Academic journals

All academics working in universities need to publish to demonstrate their capabilities and credentials within the higher education domain, and for some, publishing around higher education learning, teaching and particularly assessment has more relevance to their roles than in their specialist subject domains. In this highly practical and participative workshop, the presenters, who are both widely published in the field and have considerable expertise in commissioning, editing and reviewing for books and journals, will propose five steps that novices can take to commence publishing about higher education pedagogies. These comprise:

1. Thinking through your rationale for wanting to get published, since clarity on purposes can impact positively on subsequent decisions and choices about where and how to publish;

2. Deciding which publication outlets are best for you, since for some the requirement to publish in high-status international peer-reviewed journals is paramount, while others might consider writing monographs, chapters in edited books or electronic publications including blogs. The advantages and disadvantages of each type of outlet will be considered.

3. Getting feedback on your work, since successful writers become adept at learning from mentors, using referees’ comments and as a result, committing themselves to continuous self-enhancement;

4. Honing your writing style, since fluent, accurate and articulate writing is imperative for successful publication. The workshop facilitators will discuss how to develop a personal approach while simultaneously tailoring writing styles to particular publications;

5. Persisting in the face of setbacks, since even highly experienced writers face rejection of their work. Successful writers develop resilience in the face of such experiences and in the workshop we will consider strategies to cope with them.
